

To whom it may concern,

This comment is to show a strong disagreement with the FCC's attempt to undermine net neutrality laws. As a regulatory organization in this country your responsibility is to the consumer not the corporations that would like to gouge prices.

ISP companies are working to lighten or completely destroy the net neutrality laws as a way to structure prices that improve revenue and ultimately hurt the end consumer. They are doing this under the guise that they will be responsible with the power given to them through down grading net neutrality laws as a way to lessen red tape and there for lowering costs on their end. This is like a drug addict saying don't lock up the drugs where I can't get them just leave them in front of me and I will be responsible in not using.

In practice this will never work and will move this country to a dangerous place where ISP's will be able to censor material as they see fit simply through pricing out those who do not share the same views or those who are not willing to pay higher fees for competitive access.

I implore you to do the right thing and not allow large companies undermine the idea of a competitive open market that this country was built on.

Sincerely,

Campbell Smith
